SEE NO EVIL

Screencheat is a two to four-player splitscreen first-person shooter. Regardless of whether you're playing it alone on your PC over the Net or on the couch, you can always see everyone's perspective on your screen, and they can see yours. It's just like the old days, except everybody is invisible. Screencheating in this FPS isn't a cheap tactic, it's your only choice. If you can't work out from the other players' screens where they are and what direction and speed they are moving, then you've got little to no chance of shooting them. It's about as disconcerting as you can get: like throwing with the wrong hand or reversing a trailer, suddenly you're an unco.

"We knew from the start it would be easy to get people in and playing, but hard to keep them interested if they were just overwhelmed with the complexity of the mechanic. That's why a lot of subtle design decisions keep the gameplay fairly bare boned. Weapons are all single fire, there is no complex movement or interaction, and the tone is keep light and fun so people aren't weighed down by the mechanics and can let go and have fun. Once we nailed the right elements we found people were able to sit down and play for upwards of an hour at a time, which is impressive for a game with two to five minute rounds."

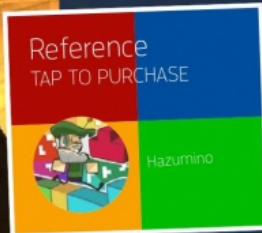

Your first few games of Screencheat probably won't go down in the halls of FPS fame; especially if you are paired with experienced players. But stick with it and the other cornerstones of the genre's heyday begin to shine brighter – it's like losing one FPS sense; the others just work in overdrive to pick up the slack. Knowing every square inch of the map like the back of your hand, listening for telltale sounds in the environment, judging trajectories in an instant: if you can't sync your other skills, you're playing blind, and you'll get owned.

"We knew frustration was a problem either for new players who aren't comfortable with the mechanic or not familiar with our maps and weapons. The key trick is simplicity and reward: we had to cut everything that was standard in shooters that didn't keep the focus on the mechanic. There are so many barriers to entry for our game that new players have to cross before they can have a good time – that has directed a lot of our design choices."

"Obviously the level design is laser focused to give as much information as possible, weapons leave trails behind after you shoot and they are only available on spawn to keep people focused on the shooting and screencheating. We do other small things, too, like removing crouch and reload – all of these elements aim to put the focus on screencheating, but the barrier still remains steep."
